this that here, too, the bachelors' houses, into which the Whites, as guests, were always first ushered, [93] [Figs. 22 and 23 appear here] [94] were, as a rule, the gable-roofed type. Special spirit huts seem to be present only here and there on Vanikoro and of little importance (1); as a rule they coincide principal supports a typical gable-roofed house has three rows of piles -- the one described for Teve rested on three center posts; the piles are driven about three feet into the ground, and their height above ground is 12 to 15 feet in the center row, four to five feet in the side rows. The center row supports the ridge piece; the side rows, a side beam each. These three beams are connected by means of the lighter purlins; all the parts are tied together with coconut fibers. The roof is covered with coconut mats; the edges project beyond the side walls. The walls, too, are closed with coconut mats. The doors, of which each house has one to three -- according to Lesson, usually only one -- are made by leaving an opening between two wall piles and are sometimes closed with boards. The total length of a house comes to about 10 to 20 French feet, the width, six to ten (3). The round huts, according to Sainson,
